

When a man achieves distinction

When a man achieves distinction in a special branch of art, it will generally be because he has turned aside from some other calling to follow the bent of his genius. It was the case with Leech, and it is with Tinley Sambourne, the artist who was awarded the gold medal at the London Pencil Show. Penn, the well-known painter, was his father. He remained with this profession for five years, pursuing his studies without any thought, apparently, of a different career. His skill with the pencil stood in good stead in the designing-room, and he made considerable progress as a draughtsman. But he never "took his time" for his waimies' instruction, and he was consequently out of fashion with the leading dancing fashions and caricaturists for the amusement of his fellow-students, one of whom showed some of his productions to Mark Lemon. The father of Punch was struck by the originality and cleverness of these modest designs, and in the beginning of 1867 Mr. Sambourne was invited to contribute to the medium of the "little small world" of John Bright. This trifling circumstance fired the ambition of the young artist, and effectually diverted his thoughts from his engineering studies. He devoted came a regular contributor to Punch, with which his name has ever since been associated.

Mr. Samboorne may be said to occupy the same position that day something the same position as Punch as Leach did in days gone by. He is certainly one of the most humorous and original of the Punch artists, but his style and humour are so peculiarly his own, that no comparison can be instituted between him and his famous predecessor. Mr. Samboorne, however, is still a young man, and there is every probability that his powers will, as he is undoubtedly he will materially increase in the future. The genuineness of his talent is strikingly exemplified by the fact that he is, artistically speaking, entirely self-taught. It is has never studied in the schools nor had any drawing lesson in his life. Another of his peculiarities is that he hardly ever draws

Now the example of Leech, Philz, and any others.
